Hi. This is Denis Savard of Ice Hockey Systems. Welcome. First of all we are talking about the D-Zone coverage here. One of the key things that's going to be important for D-Zone coverage is about protecting the house. As you saw up here, I put a little design here where it looks a bit like a house. My artwork is not the best thing in the world but this is what it looks like.

Defensive Zone Coverage - Shade vs Overload
The primary purpose of any d-zone coverage is to minimize the number of opportunities from the "home base" area of the rink (see diagram below) and force the play into the "soft" areas of the ice. Soft areas are parts of the ice where far fewer goals are scored. Red is "Home Base", Blue is "Soft Area"

The three most common systems are the strong-side overload, zone coverage/box+1 and man-on-man coverage. Unlike other aspects of a hockey system, defensive zone strategies are not really implemented in a "one size fits all" approach anymore. The game has evolved. More and more teams are using certain strategies for specific game situations.

For these reasons, today's post will focus on basic coverage within the zone defense system.. As drawn in the picture above (if you guessed I don't work in graphic design, gold star for you) the lower area of the defensive zone is generally cut up into three key areas, the hit zone, the support zone and the net zone. In our system, the strong side d-man is responsible for the hit zone.
